

my brother! Seek the Lord while He may be found.' The man drove on, shouting vile remarks, and the Meeting proceeded.

In less than ten minutes after, the same man was being wheeled past The Army ring on a Police Ambulance Wagon, having fallen from his elevated seat on his head into the road. Strange to say, he was not intoxicated. He died in the Prince of Wales Hospital on the following Wednesday, never having regained consciousness. 'God is not mocked.'

Adjutant ARTHUR C. FENOULHET.

RELATED LOVE

'Work . . . for the night cometh when no man can work.'—John ix. 4.

Tom the comedian roused himself from a drunken sleep. With an effort he tried to distinguish between his dreams and his surroundings. In his muddled brain some one was still calling for a song, another for beer; he had been calling in vain at least half an hour for whisky! And yet another—a soft, sweet voice—had been pleading for 'just a drink of water.'

A glance at the little clock on the mantelpiece woke him up to the fact that the time he had to dress and get to the theatre was a little less than twenty minutes. To cover his face with burnt cork, put on his big, once white, collar, and still larger and dirtier bow, took only a very short time, but all at once he heard the soft voice pleading for 'just a drink of water, daddie.'

In a flash his brain cleared and he remembered all. His darling little girl—the only legacy his dead wife had left him—lay ill of a burning fever. He felt more ashamed in that half moment than he had done for a whole year, and was just going to act, when the door opened, and his pal Harry asked hurriedly, 'Tom, are you coming at all to-night? Three times late last week—you'll lose your engagement,' and without another word stepped inside and caught hold of Tom by the sleeve and a banjo from the corner by the neck, and in a moment they were both in the street.

The laughter at the theatre had ceased, the drinks were done, the pals all gone, and Tom was hurrying out to find a fruit shop which might be still open. With the best bunch of juicy English grapes that money could buy Tom reached the house, opened the door very softly, and listened for the pleading voice which had been ringing in his ears all through the performance. All was quiet. The faint light of the street lamp showed him that the owner of the sweet voice was for ever still in death. She had gone where pain and death never come, and was drinking at the fountain of living water.

Ah, Tom! Night comes on apace. Your love was sincere enough, but you were a little too late with it.

Captain WALTER TOYN, Heywood.

WISE FORGETFULNESS

'The former troubles are forgotten because they are hid from Mine eyes.'—Isaiah lvi. 16.

In the course of spring cleaning it was intended to remove some illustrations which had been cut out and pasted on the wall of the children's playing room at a time when one of the busy little workers was ill.

When the 6-year-old boy heard what was proposed, he pleaded that they might remain, giving as his reason that they reminded him of the time when he had the mumps. Thus, unknown to anybody else, the memory of that painful experience had been kept fresh in his young mind for a considerable period. But, unpleasant as it had been, he strangely desired to retain it.

How often does it happen that the sight of some letter, book, picture, or ornament serves to revive a memory that should be forgotten. Far better that should be forgotten. Far better to have such a 'spring cleaning' as would remove for ever from sight that thing that reminds you of some real or imaginary injustice, unkindness, or hardship. Such a memory is a weed which will surely choke some fragrant plant that would adorn one's own life and make the lives of others happier.

Major A. FRENCH.
